Purpose

The purpose of this document is to help nurses understand their professional and legal responsibilities related to medical assistance in dying in Manitoba. Professional nursing practice standards and code of ethics for each of the three nursing professions in Manitoba underpin the guidance provided within this document. All nurses are required to practise within their own level of competence, in accordance with their education, training and professional scope of practice. For the purposes of this document, the term "nurse" refers to all three regulated nursing professionals in the province of Manitoba: licensed practical nurse (LPN), registered nurse (RN) and registered psychiatric nurse (RPN).

The Criminal Code of Canada was amended in 2016 to allow nurses to aid a physician or nurse practitioner who is providing medical assistance in dying. Nurse practitioners can refer to the practice direction and contact the College of Registered Nurses of Manitoba for further guidance pertaining to their role in medical assistance in dying in Manitoba.

It is vital that nurses recognize they can have a role in the provision of a medically assisted death. This may include providing information and support or participating in eligibility assessments as part of a team, such as aiding a physician or nurse practitioner including establishing intravenous access. The nursing role is limited because the Criminal Code permits only a physician or nurse practitioner to determine client eligibility, ensure the safeguards are met and administer the substance(s) to perform a medically assisted death.

Legal Framework and Definition of Medical Assistance in Dying

The Criminal Code provisions on medical assistance in dying (formerly referred to as Bill C-14) create an exemption from criminal prosecution for health-care providers participating in medical assistance in dying. There are two types of medical assistance in dying that are permitted under the Criminal Code:

> (a) the administering by a medical practitioner or nurse practitioner of a substance to a person, at their request, that causes their death; or
> (b) the prescribing or providing by a medical practitioner or nurse practitioner of a substance to a person, at their request, so that they may self-administer the substance and in doing so cause their own death.

Eligibility and Statutory Safeguards

A person may receive medical assistance in dying only if they meet all of the following criteria:

- They are eligible – or, but for any applicable minimum period of residence or waiting period, would be eligible – for health services funded by a government in Canada;
- They are at least 18 years of age and capable of making decisions with respect to their health;
- They have a grievous and irremediable medical condition;
- They have made a voluntary request for medical assistance in dying that, in particular, was not made as a result of external pressure; and
- They give informed consent to receive medical assistance in dying after having been informed of the means that are available to relieve their suffering, including palliative care.

Defining a Grievous and Irremediable Condition

A person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition only if they meet all of the following criteria:

- The person has a serious and incurable illness, disease or disability;
- The person is in an advanced state of irreversible decline in capability;
- That illness, disease or disability or that state of decline causes the person enduring physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to them and that cannot be relieved under conditions that they consider acceptable; and
- The person's natural death has become reasonably foreseeable, taking into account all of their medical circumstances and without a prognosis necessarily having been made as to the specific length of time they have remaining.

Section 241.2(3) of the Criminal Code sets out a number of statutory safeguards that must be met before a client can receive medical assistance in dying. These safeguards include but are not limited to the following:

- Two authorized providers, either a physician or nurse practitioner, must provide a written opinion confirming that the client meets all of the eligibility criteria for medical assistance in dying;
- The client is to be informed that they can withdraw their request for medical assistance in dying at any time, including up to immediately before the medically assisted death;
- The client must complete a request in writing;
- At least 10 days must pass between the day the request was signed by the client and the day the medical assistance in dying is provided. If both providers assessing the eligibility criteria are of the opinion that the client's death or their loss of capacity to provide informed consent is imminent, a shorter time period may be considered; and
- If the client has difficulty communicating, the providers must take all necessary measures to provide a reliable means by which the person may understand the information that is provided and communicate their decision.

These safeguards emphasize the importance of the client's decision and help avoid miscommunication and uncertainty. In addition, these requirements are evidence that the authorized providers are acting within the scope of the law and are consistent with reasonable medical knowledge and skill.

Who Can Witness

The client's request must be in written form, dated and signed by the client and two independent witnesses. These witnesses cannot:

- know or believe that they are a beneficiary under the will of the person making the request or would benefit from the client's death;
- own or operate the facility where the client resides or is receiving care;
- be directly involved in providing health-care services to the person making the request; or
- be directly involved in providing personal care to the person making the request.

Working with the Provincial Medical Assistance in Dying Clinical Team

Nurses are not authorized to autonomously determine an individual's eligibility for medical assistance in dying; however, nurses may participate in eligibility assessments as part of a team (i.e. aiding a physician or nurse practitioner).

Nurses are required to ensure that they are familiar with the relevant Criminal Code provisions and are aware of eligibility criteria and statutory safeguards necessary for a client to undergo medical assistance in dying. In addition, before participating in the medically assisted death, nurses should verify that a physician or nurse practitioner has documented that the eligibility criteria and safeguards have been met. This can be done by:

- reviewing the client's signed, written request for medical assistance in dying,
- reviewing or discussing the assessment of the eligibility and second opinion, and
- participating as a member of the medical assistance in dying inter-disciplinary team.

Having the Conversation

Good communication is essential for high quality, end of life care. Nurses are the vital link between the client, the family, the physician and other health-care providers. Currently in Manitoba we have an inter-disciplinary provincial clinical team who provides medical assistance in dying. This team also acts as a resource for clients, families and health-care professionals.

Every question from a client about assisted death suggests that the client is, or is worried about, suffering and provides an opening for a dialogue with that individual. It is important for nurses to acknowledge the expression of suffering and explore the reasons for the request. This will help nurses understand what supports might be helpful and whether the client has unmet needs. Whether or not a nurse is prepared to be involved in assisting someone to die, they remain a part of the team caring for the client. Routine or daily care and other care unrelated to the request for an assisted death remains within the scope of nursing practice. Nurses are and continue to be responsible for the provision of safe, compassionate, competent and ethical care of every client, whether or not the client is considering an assisted death.

Any nurse could be asked by a client or family member about assisted death. For some, it might be an exploration of options or simple information-seeking. For others, their questions may indicate intent to pursue an assisted death. It is important nurses:

- practice according to federal and provincial regulations, professional regulatory standards and guidelines and organizational policies related to all aspects of medical assistance in dying. For example, this would include such aspects as understanding care requirements for a client who is undergoing assessment or has been approved for medical assistance in dying;
- participate in conversations about medical assistance in dying with their team to understand the process and how privacy and confidentiality will be maintained within the team;
- acknowledge client questions and requests and explore the reasons for them. This will help the nurse assess for unmet needs and maintain a therapeutic and supportive relationship with the client;
- direct those seeking information on medical assistance in dying directly to the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team (or adhere to organizational policies that provide alternate directives), and ensure that clients are aware of all additional supports that may be available to them including palliative care or spiritual support;
- communicate with their supervisor to inform of or relay client questions about assisted death;
- know that they may provide the information on medical assistance in dying that is available on wrha.mb.ca/maid;
- document in the client health record any request for information related to medical assistance in dying including the interactions and care provided, and any resource(s) they provide to the client in accordance with professional standards and organizational policy; and
- contact their nursing regulatory body with any questions.

Nurses are not required to directly participate in the provision of medical assistance in dying. However, nurses are required to continue providing any routine care that is not related to medical assistance in dying. Refusal or failure to provide routine care may constitute abandonment and is contrary to a nurse's ethical responsibilities.

Nurses should be aware of their own feelings about assisted death and whether they are evident to the client. Clients may feel judged or discriminated against if they perceive the nature of their routine care has changed after they have indicated an interest in a medically assisted death.

Conscientious Objection

In accordance with the nursing code of ethics[1], a nurse must recognize their own personal values and beliefs about medical assistance in dying and take measures to avoid any negative impact on client care, nursing practice and the practice environment. A nurse may object to participating in medical assistance in dying; however, a nurse may not refuse or withhold care for a client that has requested medical assistance in dying. For example, a nurse is still expected to provide medications, answer a call-bell, respond to family concerns or requests and/or provide after death care.

In health care, conscientious objection is generally understood as a health-care professional's refusal to provide a service that is within their competence. Generally, it is acceptable for a nurse to make a conscientious objection when:

- they have a longstanding and deeply held belief that the requested intervention is morally wrong and/or would compromise the nurse's personal moral integrity;
- it is not an urgent or emergent situation, and;
- there is another nurse who can assume the care in a timely manner.

Conscientious objection is driven by moral concerns and informed by reflective choice; it is not based on fear, prejudice or convenience. Nurses must reflect on medical assistance in dying and determine whether it is compatible with their personal, ethical and/or religious beliefs. If it is not, they may choose not to participate on the basis of conscientious objection.

Conscientious objection raises many complex issues such as how to balance ethical practice and access to service without delay or judgment. While no nurse is required to participate directly in an assisted death, there are many other elements of care that must continue uninterrupted.

If a nurse has a conscientious objection, the initial conversation with the client is not the time for the nurse to state their objection. Whether a client enquires about the topic for the first time or has serious questions on how to begin the process, it is important nurses do not make the client feel disrespected or afraid.

While a nurse may choose to not provide information about assisted death to a client or how to access the provincial clinical team, the nurse must:

- acknowledge the client's request and assure the client their request will be conveyed;
- inform both their supervisor and employer about the request;
- maintain the therapeutic relationship with the client and continue to provide care unrelated to medical assistance in dying;
- inform the employer about their conscientious objection, and;

[1] This refers to the respective code of ethics of all three regulated nursing professions in the province of Manitoba.

- document in the client health record any request for information related to medical assistance in dying, the interaction with the client, the care provided and/or any resources given to the client in accordance with professional standards and organizational policy.

A nurse should not ignore a request for information about medical assistance in dying. A nurse should never minimize a client's request or feelings surrounding their health status and life circumstance as this could cause a client to feel abandoned or ashamed.

Nurses should also take time to reflect on their personal stance concerning medical assistance in dying well before it applies in their practice environment. Employers and nursing staff will be better prepared to support clients as a team if they reflect on and discuss a suitable, fair and compassionate approach that will support both clients and the health-care team. Consider the following scenario:

Scenario:

Tina is a nurse who works on a palliative care unit. A client she works with has requested medical assistance in dying. The Provincial Medical Assistance in Dying Clinical Team has been working with the client to accommodate the request. Tina objects to medical assistance in dying and has avoided participating in the request, including discussing it with the client and family. On the day of the client's medically assisted death, Tina calls in sick for her shift due to moral distress related to the medically assisted death.

Questions to consider:

- What moral and ethical principles are involved here?
- What are the potential implications of Tina calling in sick for her shift?
- What could Tina have done differently to address her moral objection?
- What role(s), if any, does an employer have if a nurse has a conscientious objection?

Discussion:

Some of the moral and ethical principles involved with this scenario include:

- duty to provide care;
- conscientious objection;
- responsibilities and accountability;
- fairness;
- equality and equity; and
- right to access treatment.

Tina refers to her professional code of ethics and recognizes some of the moral and ethical principles that are involved in a situation like this. By doing so, she will be better equipped to make an informed decision about whether she is prepared to participate in medical assistance in dying.

If nurses do not reflect on where they stand with medical assistance in dying, it may impact their ability to provide care to a client who has requested it. In the above scenario, Tina calling in sick may have placed an additional burden on her colleagues and potentially compromised the care of other clients.

If a nurse is uncomfortable with the idea of participating in medical assistance in dying, they should raise this concern with their employer. From here, the nurse and employer can think of ways the nurse can still provide quality care to clients while not contradicting their personal objections and professional obligations. It is also a shared responsibility between the nurse and employer to ensure they are aware of those nurses who may have a conscientious objection and to find ways to work with nurses to balance the duty to provide care while allowing them to morally object to the medically assisted death.

When to Provide Information on Medical Assistance in Dying

Section 241, 5.1 of the Criminal Code states that health-care professionals will not be committing an offense if they provide objective and lawful information to a person about medical assistance in dying.

Nurses can share information and engage in discussions about MAID with their patients. However, nurses must be mindful not to encourage or incite a patient to seek MAID. Nurses who provide clients with information about medical assistance in dying should ensure the information they are providing is correct and should not guess or speculate. Where unsure, the nurse should consult with reliable sources of information. Nurses should also remain as neutral as possible and not advocate for or against medical assistance in dying when speaking with a client.

Nurses must continue to support the client and feel free to openly discuss a client's concerns, feelings, desires and any unmet needs they may identify. Even though a client may express thoughts of suicide (suicidal ideation) or expresses a wish to die, it is important to recognize that this may not be a request for medical assistance in dying. Building the therapeutic relationship and taking the time to allow the client to express their thoughts, feelings and concerns provides context for how the client is feeling at a particular point in time. Continuing to offer compassionate, safe, competent and ethical nursing care is a duty of all nurses who have entered into a therapeutic relationship.

It is important to remember that health-care providers do not work in isolation but rather use a collaborative approach in all areas of care delivery. Nurses do not have to bear the burden of a request for information on assisted death alone and are encouraged to consult with their health-care team, regulatory body, and/or employer prior to providing any information if they are unsure about what information they can provide. Consider the following scenario:

Scenario:

Meredith, a home care nurse, is seeing Jack, a client in the community who lives alone, has chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and is on home oxygen. He is quite limited in his ability to care for himself and has previously shared with her he feels he does not have good quality of life. Today, Jack says to Meredith: "I can't do this anymore. I just want this to be over." Meredith thinks he may be talking about medical assistance in dying but is unsure. She spends some time with him talking about what he means by his statement and exploring his suffering. During the conversation Jack says: "I want help to die". Meredith asks Jack if he is familiar with the legislation around requesting medically assisted death. Jack says: "Yes, that's what I want". Meredith connects Jack with the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team.

Questions to ask:

- If Jack had initially said, "I want to die", would this change Meredith's approach?
- Why is documentation important?

Discussion:

Meredith has attended a few education sessions on medical assistance in dying and has reviewed the documents on her respective College's website but is unsure how she feels about assisted death. She recognizes it is her responsibility to provide client-centered care and document her conversation with Jack to ensure the health care team is aware of his inquiry.

Interpreting the Codes and Standards

The codes of ethics and standards of practice[2] documents act as guides for conduct and professional practice. This means that while they provide meaningful guidance for nursing practice, they are also open to interpretation.

The nursing regulatory bodies acknowledge that this direction may provide some confusion as nurses may feel that they are not meeting the standards or codes of ethics when they normally provide information to assist the client with informed-decision making. Some of these principles can be found in each of the codes of ethics and standards of practice documents including:

- providing safe, competent and ethical care,
- informed decision-making,
- justice,
- client-centered approach,
- honesty and integrity; and
- collaboration.

It is a criminal offence to counsel a person to commit suicide. In the Criminal Code, "counsel" is defined as to procure, solicit or incite. However, it is not a criminal offence for a health-care professional to provide information on the lawful provision of medical assistance in dying. This means when the client raises the subject, a nurse can carefully explore what they mean and offer information about medical assistance in dying if that is what the client was referring to.

Ineligibility for Medical Assistance in Dying

There are exceptions to who can access medical assistance in dying. At this time, the following persons are not eligible for this service:

- Those under the age of 18 years (minors);
- Those with a mental illness as the sole underlying condition;
- Those with an advanced care directive or advanced care plan who have requested medical assistance in dying as part of the plan or directive and who do not otherwise meet the criteria; and [2] This refers to the respective standards of practice and codes of ethics of all three regulated nursing professions in the province of Manitoba.

- Those who do not meet the eligibility criteria.

The nursing regulatory bodies anticipate that the federal government will provide more information and guidance on these exceptions in the future. While there are various legal and ethical opinions surrounding these exceptions, nurses are encouraged to be mindful of them. If a nurse is presented with a situation that involves one or more of these exceptions, the nurse is encouraged to consult with their health-care team, regulatory body, employer or provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team prior to providing information. Consider the following scenario:

Scenario:

A client has a long-standing history of mental health issues, including a diagnosis of major depressive disorder. This client informs the nurse providing care that he is experiencing thoughts of self-harm and wants to kill himself because the emotional and psychological pain is intolerable.

Questions to ask:

- How can the nurse address the client's pain and suffering?
- Should the nurse provide the client with information on medical assistance in dying?

Discussion:

Regardless of the nature of the request, nurses need to be open to discussing a client's pain and suffering. In this context, having these discussions allows for open communication and builds on the therapeutic relationship. There are some important issues for the nurse to consider and attend to including:

- Initiating a plan for the client's safety (including unit protocols);
- Continuing discussions addressing the client's pain and suffering;
- Any medications to be administered;
- Referrals to other providers; and
- Documentation of conversations between the nurse and client and any interventions.

In this scenario, it would be inappropriate for the nurse to initiate any discussion on medical assistance in dying even though the client has expressed a desire to end his life. Instead, the nurse should:

- Engage the client in meaningful communication to clearly understand his health needs.
- Continue using nursing assessment skills with empathy, respect and compassion.
- Reinforce the nurse's commitment to support and help the client with his care needs.

Nurses should be open to discussing issues related to pain and suffering without offering medical assistance in dying. If a client makes a request to access medical assistance in dying and they clearly do not meet the eligibility criteria that nurse could review the criteria and discuss them with the patient. It would also be appropriate for the nurse to refer the client to their attending physician or to the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team.

Limitations to the Nurse's Role

The Criminal Code provisions on medical assistance in dying (formerly referred to as Bill C-14) only permit a physician or nurse practitioner to administer the substances that will cause death. A nurse may aid the authorized provider but a nurse shall not administer the substance.

Participating in a Medically Assisted Death

Once a nurse has decided to participate in a medically assisted death, they may perform a variety of interventions as directed by the authorized health-care provider. While continuing to adhere to their nursing profession's standards of practice and code of ethics, a nurse may perform interventions such as:

- Explaining the process of the medically assisted death to clients, the client's personal supports and other health-care providers (i.e. eligibility and competency assessments, timeline, etc.);
- Coordinating the time and place of the medically assisted death with the client, their personal support people, the facility and other health-care providers as necessary;
- Participating in the assessments for competency and eligibility with a physician or nurse practitioner;
- Ensuring the medical examiner's office is aware of the approaching medically assisted death including its location, and ensuring the letter of anticipated death is in the home as applicable;
- Arranging for or providing psychosocial support to the client's personal supports and/or health-care providers;
- Establishing and maintaining intravenous access;
- Being present at the time of the medically assisted death to support the authorized health provider, the client and/or the client's support people;
- Preparing the equipment for administration. For client self-administration, the client may need aid from a nurse in preparing to take the substances but the client must be the one self-administering the substance or medication;
- Preparing the body for the funeral home (if necessary);
- Debriefing the client's support people as needed;
- Debriefing the staff at the facility if the medically assisted death occurred in facility; and
- Providing or arranging care for the client's support people and/or other health-care providers following the medically assisted death.

Documentation

Nurses are expected to document any client interaction regarding medical assistance in dying or communication with health-care team members in the client health record. Further, nurses who are participating in medical assistance in dying should clearly document the following in the health record:

- Any conversations with the client about the pain and suffering they are experiencing;
- Any client request for information on medical assistance in dying and the information provided; and
- Any aid they provided to the physician or nurse practitioner during the medical assistance in dying medically assisted death;

Documentation related to a medically assisted death must follow professional standards, organizational policies and applicable documentation guidelines.

Medical assistance in dying remains a sensitive topic that may involve varied perspectives. Nurses must maintain the privacy and confidentiality of clients and families who are involved in a medically assisted death. This includes respecting the client's wishes about communicating with their family and/or support people.

Guidance for Employers

Employers should expect questions from staff about medical assistance in dying. Employers are encouraged to read the resource on process and eligibility questions that is available on the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team's website at wrha.mb.ca/maid.

Medical assistance in dying is an involved process with several steps. It may be helpful for staff to reflect individually or with a group when considering their participation. Nurses may want to ask themselves the following questions:

- How will I respond if I am asked about medical assistance in dying?
- What are some ways I may be asked about medical assistance in dying?
- Am I prepared to engage in discussion with a client who has expressed a wish to die?
- Do I know enough about the process to educate clients and their families?
- Do I know where to find process/eligibility information?
- Am I comfortable making a referral to the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team?
    - Am I comfortable sharing the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team's contact information with clients and/or their families?; or
    - Would I pass along a client's request for information and/or interest to a supervisor?
- If a client asks me to be present during their assessments for eligibility, am I willing to do so?
- If a client asks me to be present during their medically assisted death, am I willing to do so?

It is important to recognize that nurses will have different levels of comfort and/or objection to the different steps leading up to the medically assisted death and the medically assisted death itself. Nurses are responsible to reflect and recognize their personal values and beliefs about medical assistance in dying, and to inform their employer if they have a conscientious objection to participating in any steps of the process.

It is crucial that the care the client receives does not change because they ask about assisted death. Some ways clients may perceive change in care include: less frequent check-ins by staff, shorter duration of assessments/check-ins and staff declining to discuss end of life plans.

There are several resources that nurses and employers can use to navigate the assisted dying process:

- Contact the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team by phone at 204-926-1380 or email at maid@wrha.mb.ca.
- Visit the provincial medical assistance in dying clinical team website at wrha.mb.ca/maid
- Reach out to the appropriate nursing regulatory College:
    - College of Licensed Practical Nurses of Manitoba clpnm.ca
    - College of Registered Nurses of Manitoba crnm.mb.ca
    - College of Registered Psychiatric Nurses of Manitoba crpnm.mb.ca
- Review regional or facility policies regarding medically assisted deaths.

Medical assistance in dying as a legal option is new in Canada, but talking with clients and families about end-of-life and even the wish to die is not new. This means that end-of-life conversations do not have to change. Nurses are not mandated to participate in medical assistance in dying; however, nurses are obligated to respond to a client's inquiry by acknowledging it and passing it on to a supervisor, manager or chief nursing officer depending on their employer's policy.

Frequently Asked Questions

Can I provide information to clients about medical assistance in dying?

The Criminal Code permits health-care professionals, including nurses, to provide information about the lawful provision of medical assistance in dying to a client. You can provide information, engage in discussions and educate your clients about medical assistance in dying. However, nurses cannot encourage, advise, suggest, recommend, or in any way seek to influence a client to end their life.

When do I need to have additional education for medical assistance in dying?

Nurses are required to practise within their own level of education, training and individual competence. You require a level of knowledge about medical assistance in dying that allows you to appropriately answer a client's questions and ensure they receive appropriate nursing care.

If there is a client within your practice environment who is preparing for a medically assisted death and who you may be expected to provide direct care to, you are required to have the necessary knowledge to do so safely, competently and ethically. In this scenario, you would be expected to familiarize yourself and be knowledgeable about the relevant federal and provincial regulations, professional regulatory college standards, and your employer's guidelines and organizational policies.

Can I start an IV or PICC line for a client that will be used for medical assistance in dying?

Yes, as long as you are practising within your professional scope of practice and individual competence. Nurses can assist a physician or nurse practitioner to provide medical assistance in dying in accordance with the law. This may include inserting an intravenous or peripherally inserted central catheter that will be used to administer medications that will cause the death of a client.

Am I allowed to hand syringes of medications to a physician or nurse practitioner that they will administer to end a client's life?

Yes. In accordance with the law, this would be considered aiding the authorized administering provider with the medically assisted death. Only the physician or nurse practitioner may administer the substance(s) to perform medical assistance in dying.

If the IV team is called to start the IV for a client for the purposes of administering medical assistance in dying, should the IV nurse be told the purpose? Would this be breaching the client's confidentiality?

Informing the IV team about the purpose for the IV start would be appropriate because they are involved in the client's care.

It's possible the IV nurse may have a conflict with this based on their basic values and beliefs. Providing information to the IV team in advance may prevent a potential conflict for that nurse on the basis the nurse has a conscientious objection to medical assistance in dying.

If the IV nurse has a conscientious objection to participating, it may delay the start of an IV as the client's care would need to be transferred to another nurse. In this case, let the client know that other health-care team members, such as the IV team, will need to be informed since any care they provide may legally be considered participating in a medically assisted death. Assure the client that this information will be disclosed only as necessary to those who are involved in their care. Nurses must be aware of and follow any organizational policies related to client privacy.

My client wishes to have a medically assisted death. I want to care for them and support their family, but I don't want to be present for the medication infusion and their death. Can I start their IV and then leave the room?

Yes. However, you should openly communicate this with your employer ahead of time to ensure the client will continue to receive high quality, coordinated and uninterrupted care.

Having open discussions with your employer in advance helps ensure a clear and smooth handover of client responsibilities. It also prevents any unnecessary confusion, stress, or worry on the client and their family when another nurse provider enters the client's bedside.

Can I refuse to provide a client with information about medical assistance in dying if I have a conscientious objection to doing so?

While you may not want to provide information based on your values and beliefs, you cannot prevent your client from accessing information about medical assistance in dying. This is not the time for a nurse to share their personal objection with the client. A nurse is still obligated to ensure the client is safe and that their suffering is addressed as soon as possible. Nurses should acknowledge the client's request by:

- exploring the client's suffering in a caring and compassionate manner,
- collaborating with colleagues and the employer to meet the client's needs,
- exploring their own feelings about participating in medical assistance in dying, and
- making referrals as appropriate.

The Criminal Code also allows for a physician or nurse practitioner to provide or prescribe to a person, at their request, so that they may self-administer the substance to cause death. Am I allowed to pass these medications to the client?

Yes. The law provides an exemption for persons assisting a client to "do anything, at another person's explicit request, for the purpose of aiding that other person to self-administer a substance that has been prescribed for that other person as part of the provision of medical assistance in dying".

If a nurse is asked to participate in a medically assisted death and is comfortable doing so, they must ensure the client meets eligibility criteria for a medically assisted death in Canada.

A physician has asked me to participate in the assessment of a client who is requesting a medically assisted death. Am I allowed to?

Yes. You may do this if you are comfortable doing so and if the client agrees to your presence.

I work in a facility where medically assisted deaths have been performed. Am I allowed to be a witness to a client's signing of an official request to a medically assisted death?

No. Witnesses to a client signing a formal request for a medically assisted death cannot:

a) know or believe that they are a beneficiary under the will of the person making the request, or a recipient, in any other way, of a financial or other material benefit resulting from that person's death;

b) be an owner or operator of any health-care facility at which the person making the request is being treated or any facility in which that person resides;
c) be directly involved in providing health-care services to the person making the request; or
d) be directly providing personal care to the person making the request.

Is a nurse obligated to voice a conscientious objection and must the employer accommodate a conscientious objection?

Yes. This is a shared responsibility between the nurse and employer. The nurse must let their employer know they have a conscientious objection so that the employer can make accommodations for the nurse while assuring care for the client continues (e.g. staff scheduling on the day of the assisted death). Even though a nurse may have a conscientious objection, this does not absolve them from providing day-to-day care or acknowledging a request for medical assistance in dying. Nurses are responsible to reflect and recognize their personal values and beliefs about medical assistance in dying, and to inform their employer if they have a conscientious objection to participating in any steps of the process.

It is also important for employers to recognize that nurses will have different levels of comfort and/or objection to the steps leading up to the medically assisted death and the medically assisted death itself. It is the responsibility of the employer to acknowledge and address any conscientious objections raised by nursing staff and to accommodate these requests as much as reasonably possible.

The most important piece is for both the nurse and employer to be open to discussions about medical assistance in dying and to encourage dialogue. This will lead to a greater understanding of employer expectations surrounding medical assistance in dying and will allow employers to be aware of any potential issues surrounding an assisted death in their practice area or facility.

Can a family member or proxy make a request on behalf of the client for their medically assisted death?

No. The law requires that the person's request for medical assistance in dying be made in writing, signed and dated by the person requesting it. If the person is unable to sign, another person may sign on their behalf in the person's presence and under the person's express direction as long as the other person:

- is at least 18 years of age,
- understands the nature of the request, and
- does not know or believe that they are the beneficiary under the will of the person making the request, or a recipient, in any other way, of a financial or other material benefit resulting from that person's death.

Eligibility criteria for a medically assisted death requires that the person is able to provide informed consent to receive medical assistance in dying after having been informed of the means that are available to relieve their suffering, including palliative care.

The law requires that the client give express consent and have the opportunity to withdraw their request up until immediately before a medically assisted death. Family members or proxies are not legally permitted to make the decision or provide consent on behalf of the client for a medically assisted death at any time.

Advanced directives (also known as living wills), allow for explicit instruction on consent or refusal of treatment in specified circumstances. They may also be used to appoint or designate a substitute decision-maker to consent or refuse treatment or care in the event a person becomes incapacitated. Because the law requires the person's direct express consent, medical assistance in dying cannot be provided on the authority of an advanced directive.
